Both flying squirrels were taken for biologists conducting research at the Northern and Western Illinois University in order to learn more about their natural habitats and behavior. The two northern flying squirrels have been identified to be from the species Glaucomys sabrinus. They are 20 inches in length and have white to bluish-gray fur. They are a medium-sized squirrel, according to the US Fish and Wildlife Service. Under squirrels, walking is commonly seen amongst them as well. They normally live in open forests and can be found in highly wooded and treed areas from February to August, according to the Ornithology Fishes and Wildlife Center. Their diet is made up of mainly vegetation. They are rarely seen at higher altitudes. They usually spend their time in the lower part of trees. Like most squirrels, flying squirrels are classified as a nocturnal animal. Conservation They are under the category of the IUCN Red List of threatened species. This means that they are listed as a species whose population is decreasing because of threats. A soft-skinned flying squirrel The IUCN Red List classifies them as vulnerable. The number of glaucomys is declining all the time because of deforestation. This study suggests the glaucomys species is a slow breeder. Closing Comments Of the total two living flying squirrels found, one was taken in Dixon and the other was taken in the nearby area of Glenview, Illinois. The effect of aluminum ions on the binding of bovine brain carbonic anhydrase to sarcoplasmic reticulum membrane phospholipid vesicles. The effect of aluminum ions (Al³⁺) on the binding of bovine brain carbonic anhydrase I to vesicles prepared from sarcoplasmic reticulum membrane of canine cardiac muscle cells and phospholipids from sarcoplasmic reticulum was studied. The results of the equilibrium dialysis studies indicate that the Al³⁺ ions facilitate the binding of the enzyme to phospholipids isolated from sarcoplasmic reticulum vesicles in a dose-dependent manner. Formation of the Al-phospholipid-enzyme complex was not accompanied by a decrease in the electrokinetic potential of sarcoplasmic reticulum membranes.News Bury FC in talks to sign Manchester United goalkeeper De Gea Manchester United are reportedly looking to offload their first-choice goalkeeper David de Gea, and Bury are hoping to snap him up if the price is right. Sir Alex Ferguson is said to want to sign his deputy in order to keep him at the centre of the club's future plans and Bury have no intention of letting him leave for free. De Gea has made only six league appearances for United this season, but it appears manager Louis van Gaal will not get his money's worth from him for much longer. And, in the midst of reported negotiations between Ferguson and Bayern Munich to sign Renato Sanches, Bury are hoping to bring him to the Shakers on loan. De Gea is reportedly keen on a move to Spain, and Bury have already sounded out Barcelona over a deal for the former Atletico Madrid youngster. The Spaniard has worked his way up to club captain after impressing at a young age, and that experience would be invaluable for young shotstopper John Brayford, who was made the club's permanent record-holder for clean sheets earlier this season. That was after an error against Liverpool saw the Reds go ahead in October's 1-1 draw, and Bury are willing to be patient with the goalkeeper, who turned 22 in January. Bury are currently in 11th in the Championship, just three points above the relegation zone.Preview: The West Brom striker, who has been linked to the Baggies throughout the season, is rated at least
